JOSHA – Journal of Science Humanities and Arts

In this issue, we once again have an amazing amalgamation of topics involving history, law, medicine and arts in 11 articles. The topics range from interesting historical discourses between great thinkers from the past to present-day laws in education and philosophy of science. The first article in this issue, contributed by Stephen Seiler, makes the readers revisit history. The eight "missed encounters" mentioned in this essay take us through a journey that describes events that could have rewritten history. The article contributed by Frank Wertheimer addresses a key reform that has been made in the medical school education system in Germany. The contribution by Werner Schempp with his article "Individuality and integrity of humans in the modern age: Considerations of a natural scientist" gives the readers food for thought by addressing polarization of science and if art could restore the balance.

The authors Usman Al-Amin and group give the readers an insight into the quintessential role of community-based agriculture and poverty reduction programs in the Bursari area of Yobe state in Nigeria. In the subsequent article, the same authors provide an interesting analysis of the various reasons for the boom in the pharmaceutical business in Borno state in Nigeria. Another interesting article on the law by the author Charles Mark gives us fresh perspectives on the existing commercial agent's regulations in England and Scotland.

To add to the list, the contribution by Arvind Venkat and group introduces the readers to the development they have made to the questionnaire used to evaluate the attitudes of clinicians towards patients with alcohol use disorders.

Yet another exciting short story by Zazie-Charlotte Pfeiffer is fun to read and reflecting an important aspect of growing up. The psychoanalytical reflection on Oedipus and its implication for the concept of law is a milestone; "The Law or: the Affliction" by Hans-Joachim Behrendt

The last two articles in this issue, one by Mario Pagliaro on the scientific cooperation between Israel and Italy and the one by Hannah Dittmers on the Alien Tort Statute to human rights violation in the United States are extremely interesting and informative.

We at JOSHA wish all our readers a joyful reading experience.
